Lasher, a heritage of helping South Africa to grow

Whether you're talking construction or gardening and DIY, mining or agriculture, Lasher makes the tools that help South Africa to grow

With more than 100 years of designing, manufacturing and distributing tough, reliable tools built for the South African market by South Africans, Lasher has played an important role in this country's heritage, as well as its economy.

With a vast product range that spans the mining, forestry, agriculture, construction, DIY and gardening sectors, the odds are high that, in any given moment, you are surrounded by items that have been touched by Lasher. From the food you eat, produced in your garden, or on local farms with the help of tools from Lasher, to hammers, trowels, chisels and wheelbarrows used on the construction of many important buildings. The ceremonial spade used to open Johannesburg's iconic Ponte building, for example, was made by Lasher, as were many of the tools used to build the tower.

But, most importantly, Lasher is 100% South African, from the design of its more than 1000-strong product range, to the manufacture to ISO 9001 standards, which takes place in Wadeville, Germiston and Ladysmith, there is no other company locally that matches the volumes produced or the quality that Lasher consistently maintains.

Lasher will always be a proudly South African company, which means that as it grows its footprint across Africa as well as Europe, the United States and Australasia, it will continue to grow job opportunities in South Africa and to contribute to the local economy.

Whatever your industry, if it's tough, reliable tools guaranteed that you're after, keep it Lasher, keep it local.
